John Loge Baird, who is called "the father of television" was born in Scotland in 1888. He became an inventor at the age of 26. In 1923, he became interested in the idea of pictures by radio. He started working in his bedroom with a torch, a knitting needle, a few parts from a radio; a wooden box and some cardboard. He worked for several months, and the following year he succeeded in transmitting the first “television” picture a few meters across the room. In 1926 he showed it to the public at the Royal society.

In 1928, he transmitted the first picture across the Atlantic and in 1929, the BBC and the German Post Office began to broadcast TV with his System.

There was another System in America called the Marconi-Emi System. That System used electronics instead of moving parts.

In 1936, the BBC decided to choose the electronic System from Emi after the competition between the two Systems.

Baird was very unhappy, but there was nothing that he could do. For the rest of his life, he tried to develop new ideas but had no success. In the end, he became ill and died in 1946 at the age of 57.

One day, Joseph Montgolfier was relaxing in front of the fire watching his clothes dry when he noticed that one of his shirts had started to float upwards. He was curious so he threw some pieces of paper in the fireplace to see if the same thing happened to them. He saw them come out of the chimney. He got his brother Jacques to help him. They started experimenting on something that later became the first hot-air balloon.

On September 19th, 1783 they presented their first hot-air balloon, made from paper and cloth. They felt too nervous to test it out themselves so they put a sheep, a duck and a chicken in the basket. The two-mile trip was a success.
